

Examines how the five mainstream religions conceive of 'our place in the universe' by considering their beliefs concerning: God, the creation, the nature of man, the purpose of life and the afterlife.

A clear, succinct and expanded edition of the author's 'Honours' thesis. Here are some of the examiner's comments:

A well collated and analyzed selection of relevant scriptures. Clearly set out, well written and carefully considered, showing his understanding.

It is an informative encapsulation of the material for any reader.

A thesis of tight construction and careful categorization of the evidence. Ex. One

I read your thesis with great interest. I enjoyed reading it and think you have taken on a huge and important project.

The established categories help enormously in making the subject comprehensible and your methodology is a good technique for exploring the complexities of religious thought.

I think that your conclusion, that each religion posits that one must go beyond one's individual ego in order to attain higher realization, is valid. Ex. Two

This is a very interesting thesis, covering a vast topic area. The author's willingness to tackle such an involved and challenging task is to be commended.

His ability to come to grips with many of the key tenets of each religion is commendable.

A most fascinating discussion of the various religions. Ex. Three.

The 'streams' examined are Judaism/Kabbalah, Christian Fundamentalism/Catholicism, Islam/Sufism, Advaita Vedanta/Vaishnavism, and Theravada/Tibetan Buddhism.
